Previously, if someone made a request with `verify=False` then made a request where they expected verification to be enabled to the same host, they would potentially reuse a connection where TLS had not been verified.

This fixes that issue.

Not against this, but I think this is the first time we're introducing typing into Requests. I'm curious if we want to start that or push it into typeshed since this will be precedent for future inline typing?

This is for a private method (that I fully anticipate people abusing) but we're not advertising things are typed and so it's not something I'm concerned with.

There may not be a better way to test this but I don't know if we have other tests that require contacting a live site with TLS disabled. That may have some durability issues and means we're going to take the first response we get back. Probably minor, but figured I'd call it out.

There are many alternatives here, but those are all significantly more effort and this shows the behaviour is fixed before and after handily. I'm sure Linux folks will get pissed but I'm not as bothered about finding time later to do this a different way after we have fixed this

I'll try to prioritize better (offline) tests soon
